Without a crystal ball tati westbrook

Here’s all you need to know about Tati Westbrook and the Without a Crystal Ball Lawsuit!On November 26th, Tati launched her beauty line Tati Beauty, a different brand from her vitamin brand Halo Beauty. This is where the business gets involved. In her Halo Beauty reveal, she says she’ll do all her products from color cosmetics to fragrance under the Halo Beauty roof. But this wasn’t the case with her first product. Some loyal fans also noticed this difference, and this part will be important in the court case. Neither James nor Jeffree reviewed the palette, mostly because they weren’t on the PR list for the brand.On January 3rd, James Charles tweeted a rather shady but in my opinion a mindless tweet about Coachella 2020.THIS IS ABOUT TO BE THE BEST COACHELLA YET!!!!  no boys or vitamins!!!!!!!! just good music, outfits, photos & memories let’s GOOOO ❤️ James Charles (@jamescharles) January 3, 2020And that is how we are still talking about this drama that happened ages ago. It never ends.On June 30th, Tati released another video after taking a break from Youtube for almost 2 months. And more people got involved in the drama! Tati claims that Shane Dawson, an OG Youtuber that is mainly in entertainment but did a documentary with Jeffree Star and released an eyeshadow palette and JFC, tricked her into making the video & offered to edit it even, and Jeffree Star was also orchestrating this whole drama. At the time Shane Dawson also had other issues going on for him, but this video coming out of nowhere shook everyone. Shane even went live on Instagram bashing Tati, it wasn’t pretty. She also apologized to James. Tati hasn’t uploaded since then. Now after all this mess, Tati’s name came up on a drama channel called Without A Crystal Ball. Without a Crystal Ball has come for Tati several times already, and she is not much loved in the “drama” community, but this time she released Tati’s court papers by her former business partner in Halo Beauty who is suing her. Without A Crystal Ball claims Tati destroyed James’s career & caused him millions of dollars in her video, which Tati claims is a lie. After the video was posted, Tati, while being sued by her business partner, sued Without A Crystal Ball for fake news & harassment. And this is how the “Without a Crystal Ball Lawsuit” came to happen!Why is Tati’s former business partner suing her? For money. Her former partner claims that she and her husband James Westbrook and himself had the same shares in the company. However, Tati wanted to be a bigger part of the company as she was also the spokesperson for it, and that if that happened she would release any products under the Halo Beauty roof. (Remember Tati Beauty? This is where you’ll need it.) Her partner accepted the offer, and this resulted in Tati owning most of the shares. But she didn’t do as she promised, and released color cosmetics under a new brand, which caused her business partner to not get any of the profits from the cosmetics. The partner also claims they have been transferring money from Halo Beauty to other accounts so they get more of the profit, and use it to their benefit. The partner also claims that Tati said she had a lot of famous friends who would support the products she releases, hence why she was so mad at the Vitamin ads of James, and that Tati claimed whatever product had her name on it, it would sell out. She actually blamed James Charles on her first video “Bye Sister” for letting fame go over his head, and she seems to be in the same position now. But this is not where it ends! Tati countersued her business partner for putting out lies, and that she never confirmed on producing products under the Halo Beauty roof. She also claims he has been harassing women & never provided what he promised for Halo Beauty. There are several allegations like how her business partner Mr.Swanson had been scamming people under the Westbrook name, and he was addicted to a drug. As a result, Tati didn’t want to be involved with Mr.Swanson and left Halo Beauty to her husband James Westbrook, and James has been managing the company ever since. This is what we got on this story for now. But it doesn’t seem to end sometime soon, so stay tuned for more updates!  Beauty News Beauty guru Tati Westbrook has settled one of the lawsuits she’s currently embroiled in. Her long feud with Katie Joy Paulson of Without a Crystal Ball fame appears to be at an end. Tati filed the lawsuit against Paulson in October 2020, alleging that the Without a Crystal Ball YouTuber created multiple defamatory videos about her. The suit quickly took a turn for the dramatic with accusations of hacking, death threats, and the alleged destruction of evidence. Both sides fired shots at each other over social media, filed dozens of motions, and eventually were called in for a status hearing that resulted in the judge chastizing everyone for their bad behavior. Paulson filed a motion to dismiss, saying that the Washington court — where Tati filed her lawsuit — didn’t have jurisdiction over her, since she lives in another state. The court agreed and eventually granted Paulson’s motion, but the story didn’t end there. The court dismissed the case without prejudice, meaning that Tati could refile the lawsuit in Minnesota, where Paulson lives. The beauty and drama communities expected Tati to refile the lawsuit, but in a twist, she and Paulson have reached a settlement. The first indication that the issue was resolved came from Tati’s lawyer, Michael Saltz, on Twitter. He posted a picture of a courthouse in Minneapolis with a caption saying that thanks to mediation efforts, the Westbrooks and their attorneys won’t be seeing the inside. In other words, the mediation succeeded, and they reached an agreement that brings the lawsuit saga to an end. The terms of the settlement are private. With that lawsuit off her plate, Tati can turn her attention to her other legal situation. Clark Swanson is suing Tati and her husband for fraud, negligence, and allegedly breaching their fiduciary duty for Halo Beauty, the company co-founded by Swanson and the Westbrooks. Swanson filed his lawsuit in California. His suit names Tati and her husband, Tati Cosmetics, and Halo Beauty as defendants. It alleges that the Westbrooks broke previous agreements that they’d made with him, entered into collaborations without his knowledge, and then cut him out of earnings that he was due. There's a new twist in the neverending YouTube beauty community drama. Tati Westbrook — the veteran beauty guru, entrepreneur, and hair vitamin scandal aggressor — is being sued by her business partner. Halo Beauty is Westbrook's flagship company, marketing nutritional vitamin supplements that include a "Hair, Skin, & Nails Booster" and a "Kiwi Skin Booster." Westbrook launched Halo Beauty in 2018, and while it was a successful indie beauty brand from the start, the company's popularity exploded in May 2019 after Westbrook accused fellow beauty YouTuber James Charles of disloyalty to her brand for marketing competing SugarBearHair vitamins. Now, a complaint filed on October 20, 2020, by Halo Beauty co-founder and co-owner Clark Swanson claims that Westbrook and her husband James committed fraud, negligence, and breach of fiduciary duty in their Halo Beauty ownership roles, causing the company and Swanson to suffer financially. He's seeking damages greater than $25,000.Swanson sued the Westbrooks, Tati Cosmetics (which owns Westbrook's cosmetics line Tati Beauty), and Halo Beauty in the Superior Court of California in Los Angeles County, according to the 30-page complaint obtained by Insider.Tati Westbrook's business partner claims she made a false promise that lost him millions in potential profitsSwanson's key claim is that he and the Westbrooks originally decided to launch a company split 50/50 between them, with Swanson owning half the company and Tati and James each owning 25%. The plan was to build a nutraceuticals company that would sell ingestibles with health benefits. Notably, Swanson says he had to use his credit lines to establish the company since the Westbrooks previously underwent a personal bankruptcy. Swanson also says he patented Halo's first supplement.On August 1, 2017, Swanson says he met with the Westbrooks at his home and that the two asked him to reconsider the company's future and ownership structure. Swanson says Tati and James promised to make Halo Beauty the umbrella brand for all of Tati's future product lines, including cosmetics, skincare, and fragrances. Swanson says he agreed to re-split Halo Beauty ownership with each of them holding 1/3, in part so that Westbrook could easily maintain a public appearance as the company's CEO. He claims that the Westbrooks touted Tati's celebrity YouTube status to convince Swanson that her brands would be profitable. According to Swanson, Halo Beauty's supplements were profitable at first, netting him and the Westbrooks over $3 million, or over $1 million each, in 2018. In 2019, when Halo received a major publicity boost due to Westbrook's feud with Charles, Swanson says earnings were almost tripled.  Throughout 2018, Swanson claims he met with cosmetics development companies and other members of the beauty industry, including with veteran beauty YouTuber Michelle Phan to discuss prospective business in China. Swanson claims the Westbrooks either showed no interest in his activities or actively asked him to "stand down" from expanding Halo Beauty.Then, in April 2019, Swanson says James Westbrook told him Tati Beauty would be launching under a different company, Seed Beauty. Swanson claims that he was thus shut out from what he estimated was the $16 million launch of the first Tati Beauty eyeshadow palette. Swanson also says the Westbrooks blocked planned skincare product launches through Halo Beauty and forced the company to "coast" throughout the rest of 2019, after the launch of Tati Beauty in October 2019. In February 2020, Swanson says James Westbrook informed him that Tati would be launching a fragrance line separately from Halo. Swanson claims the Westbrooks' "neglect" of Halo Beauty has caused "severe damage" to the company and, when prompted to honor their 2017 agreement, Swanson says James Westbrook "distributed hundreds of thousands of dollars in operating income," which Swanson alleges is "a further attempt to devalue and destroy Halo Beauty by looting company coffers in advance of a lawsuit." Within the claims, Swanson also alleges that Tati said she could sell a "s---" product to her fans and that they would still buy it, and Swanson claims James Westbrook told him that the Tati Beauty palette was a "turnkey" deal with Seed Beauty — which would imply Tati Westbrook had little creative control over the product, unlike she claimed on YouTube.Claims about other beauty influencers in the complaint have renewed interest in Westbrook's feud with James CharlesApart from the central claims in the complaint, Swanson also included tidbits about other beauty YouTubers that have caught the attention of the YouTube drama community. Swanson says Westbrook told him in 2017 that she could rely on her fellow beauty influencers like Charles to promote Halo Beauty — a claim that was undermined by Charles' now-infamous SugarBearHair endorsement in May 2019, the complaint says. At the time, Westbrook responded to Charles' SugarBearHair Instagram story ad with an explosive video titled "Bye Sister." While most of "Bye Sister" was about Charles betraying Halo Beauty, Westbrook also leveraged serious accusations, alleging that Charles used his money and fame to try and sexually manipulate straight boys. Charles denied the unsubstantiated claims, and Westbrook later apologized.  Tati Westbrook said Jeffree Star and Shane Dawson fed her "lies and manipulation" to try and destroy James Charles' career. Screenshot YouTube/Tati But the narrative that Charles was a predator caught on quickly, resulting in Charles losing millions of YouTube subscribers and dealing a serious long-time blow to his reputation. The pile-on grew when fellow beauty YouTuber Jeffree Star also accused Charles of being a "predator" and a "danger to society." Charles similarly denied Star's unsubstantiated claims, and Star also later apologized.  In June 2020, Westbrook returned from an unexplained YouTube absence to release a new bombshell video. She claimed that Star and his frequent YouTube collaborator Shane Dawson "manipulated" her into releasing the claims and video against Charles. Afterward, Star apologized to Charles again, but didn't address Westbrook's claims. Both Dawson and Westbrook have yet to return to YouTube.In light of Swanson's complaint, YouTubers like Katie Joy, AKA Without A Crystal Ball — the first YouTube channel to report on the lawsuit — have suggested that Westbrook's cryptic June 2020 video and unexplained internet hiatus before and since could have been an attempt to get ahead of Swanson's claims. In her last video, Westbrook shifted the blame for "Bye Sister" onto Star and Dawson, but Swanson's complaint draws a direct tie between Westbrook's fiduciary duties as Halo Beauty co-owner and Charles' SugarBearHair endorsement. Westbrook and Tati Beauty didn't respond to Insider's request for comment. Westbrook also has yet to respond to Swanson's complaint, although the Superior Court of California's website says a hearing for the case is scheduled for April 21, 2021, in Santa Monica, California.  Veteran YouTuber Tati Westbrook and her husband, James, are facing a new lawsuit. Halo Beauty co-founder Clark Swanson has recently filed a legal complaint in which he claimed that Tati and her husband committed fraud and negligence, while also breaching their fiduciary duty as the owners of the company. As Clark alleges, their wrongdoing yielded to an estimated $25,000 in damages. Article continues below advertisementAs per Insider, Clark is suing Tati and James, their company, Tati Cosmetics, and Halo Beauty. As he claims, their misconduct yielded to about $25,000 in losses.  The documents detailing their alleged shortcomings as business partners and the supposedly deceitful tactics Tati deployed as a YouTuber were submitted to the Superior Court of the State of California in Los Angeles County, Calif. on Oct. 20, 2020. Source: InstagramArticle continues below advertisementAccording to Insider, Clark argues that Tati and James have failed to adhere to a previous agreement holding that all future cosmetics, skincare, and fragrance products have to be launched under Halo Beauty. As Clark prompts, the couple initiated collaborations with various other brands without his knowing. One of the examples he names is Tati's first makeup palette, Textured Neutrals Vol.1., which was released in October 2019 in collaboration with Seed Beauty. Clark now claims that the step racked up about $16 million in losses. Article continues below advertisementClark, Tati, and James came to the agreement after the couple renegotiated their original deal holding that they would have equal ownership over the company. Instead of a 50-50 percent split, James and Tati demanded that they own 75 percent of the company, leaving Clark with 25 percent. To make up for the decrease in profit, they offered to launch every beauty product through Halo Beauty — which they consequently failed to uphold. DAILY DOSE OF STUPID: Tati Westbrook and husband sued by business partner for fraud, among other things. According to Insider, Tati and James have actively hindered Clark from further expanding the company. In addition to raising concerns about his business partner's potential misconduct, Clark points out that Tati misleadingly claimed that she was actively involved in the design process of Textured Neutrals Vol.1. in a previous YouTube video. According to Insider, Clark claims that some of James' previous remarks would indicate otherwise. Article continues below advertisementAccording to a new rumor, there's a chance that Tati recently filed a lawsuit against fellow social media creator Katie Joy (aka Without a Crystal Ball) as well. A recent Instagram post Katie shared on Sunday, Nov. 1, 2020, seems to confirm the fan theory that's making the rounds on Twitter. "I deactivated my Twitter today. I will be back. […] I’m not hiding anything, I’m not running from anything. I just can’t answer anything […] Demanding i answer questions will never work & you obviously don’t understand the legal system," she wrote. Later on in the post, Katie also advised her Instagram followers with a YouTube presence to be particularly careful when it comes to posting commentaries. Fans believe that Tati sued Katie for defamation.
