"The hard snow that kept me, save where you so long and then a foot crossed. The view was all straight up and down of thin trees too tall to mark or name a place to say for sure that I was here or somewhere: I was just far away from home. A little bird flew in front of me. He was careful to put a tree between us when he turned on, and not to say that no word to tell me who was so foolish to think about what he thought. He thought he was after him for a feather - the white one in his tail; Like someone who takes everything that was personal to himself. A flight out sideways would call it. And then there was a pile of wood for which I forgot and let her little fear take him out of the way I could have gone, without so much wishing him good night. He went behind to make his last stand. It was a cord of maple, cut and split and stacked - and measured, four by four by eight. And not another as if I could see. No track of the runner in this year's snow loops near it. And he was older than this year, or even last year or year before. The wood was gray and the bark destroyed it and the pile a little crowded. Clematis had wounded ropes around and around him as a pack. What kept it on one side was a tree that grew again, and on a pole and spike, the latter are about to fall. I thought that only someone who lived in addressing the fresh tasks could forget his hand work on which he spent himself, the work of his axe, and leave it there away from a useful fireplace to warm the frozen swamp as best could with the slow burn without smoke of decay. After Apple Picking is a curious poem that, apparently, speaks of a person who thinks loud, tells a complicated story of apple collection and how sleep will resent it because the work has been exhausting. Since the poet is Robert Frost, this superficial explanation will not be enough. Later, you might also ask, what does betulle poetry mean? In poetry, the act of swinging on the betulles is presented as a way to escape the lasting rationality or “ Truth” of the adult world, even if only for a moment. The wooden pile is a poem that has been praised for its quality of "faithfulness to the fact". It is a poem that adheres strictly to the facts of experience. It is in the form of a pure description of what happened to the poet during his wandering. Poetry has a hesitant beginning: – I will return from here. She saw her from the bottom of the stairs before she saw him. He was starting from the bottom, looking behind for fear. He made a doubtful step and then canceled it to get up and look again. He spoke advancing toward her: ‘What you see from up there always – because I want to know.’ He turned and fell on his skirts at that point, and his face changed from terrified to obtuse. He said to earn time: "What do you see?" he encamped until he bowed down. – I will find out now, you have to tell me, dear. She, in her place, refused any help with the slightest stiffness of the neck and silence. She let him look, confident that he would not see, blind creature; and for a while he did not see. But in the end he bit, "Oh", and again, "Oh". "What is it, what is it?" he said. – Exactly what I see. – No, she said. Tell me what it is. The wonder is, I didn't see it right away. I never noticed from here. I have to be attracted to it, that's why. The little cemetery where my people are! SoThat the window frames everything. Not much larger than one bedroom, right? There are three slate stones and one of marble, wide slaves shouldal in the sunlight sun The Sidehill. We don't have those in mind. But I understand: they are not the stones, but the tumulus of the child ... "Do not do it, not, no," he cried. He retired from under his arm resting on the bannister and slipped downstairs; And turned to him with such a daunting look, he said twice before you know: "Can't a man talk about his son who lost?" Oh, where's my hat? Oh, I don't need it! I gotta get out of here. I have to get air. I don't know rightly if a man can. ''Amy! Don't go to someone else this time. Listen to me. I'm not going down the stairs. "He sat down and whipped the chin between his fists. "There's something I'd like to ask you, dear. "You don't know how to ask." "Help me, then." Her fingers moved the stop for all answers. "My words are almost always a crime. I don't know how to talk about something so you like it. But I could be taught that I should guess. I can't say I see how. A man must in part give up being a man with women-folk. We could have some deal I'd read about to keep going through anything special that you're a mind to name. Even if I don't like the things that twixt those they love. Two who don't love can't live together without them. But two who can't live with them. "He moved a bit the stop. 'Don't do it - don't go. Don't take it to someone else this time. Tell me about this if it's something human. Let me get into your pain. I'm not that much unlike other people while your stalliere there should get me out. Give me my chance I think, though, you run out a little bit. What has led you to think that the thing takes your mother - loss of a first child in an inconsistent way - in front of love. You'd think his memory could be satisfied-- '' You go to snering now! "I am not, I am not! You make me mad. I'll come to you. God, what a woman! And he came to this, a man can't talk about his son who died. "You can't because you don't know how to talk. If you had feelings, you running away with your hand, how could you? - His little tomb. I saw you from that same window there, making the pebble jump and jump into the air, jumping up, like that, like that, and landing so slightly and rolling down the tumulus next to the hole. I thought, who's that man? I didn't know you. And I crawled down the stairs and up the stairs to look again, and still your vanga kept raising. Then you came in. I heard your loud voice in the kitchen, and I don't know why, but I went close to seeing with my eyes. You could sit there with stains on your shoes of the fresh earth from your baby's grave and talk about your daily worries. You had the sword against the wall outside in the lobby, because I saw it. "I'll laugh at the worst laugh I've ever laughed. I'm cursed. God, if I don't think I'm“I can repeat the words you were saying. “Three foggy mornings and a rainy day will become the best birch fence a man can build.” Think about it, talk like how at such a time! What was there how long it takes a birch to rot to do with what was in the dark living room. You didn’t care! Closest friends can go with anyone to death, gets so far short Might as well not try to go. No, since one is sick to death, one is alone, and he dies alone. Friends pretend to follow the tomb, but before one is in it, their minds are turned And make the best of their return to life And the living people, and the things they understand. But the evil of the world. It won’t hurt, so if I can change it. Oh, I won’t, I won’t! Well, you’ve said everything and you feel better. You’re not leaving now. You’re crying. Close the door. The heart’s out of it, why keep it up. Amy! There’s someone coming down the road! You... you think the speech is everything. I have to go to this house. How can I... If... He was opening the widest door. Where do you wanna go? Tell me first. I’ll follow you and bring you back by force. I will! '
