(Definition of a certain passage from the Cambridge Advanced Learner Dictionary & Thesaurus Â© Cambridge University Press) What exactly does the expression “in some ways” mean, as in The English language is limited in some ways, and perhaps more limited in its ability to express love. Is it generic (as in many ways) or specific (as in a few ways)? Can you give an example of an equivalent expression? 3 Hello guys!!! Is there any difference between “somehow” and “somehow”? I mean, regardless of whether the sentence is negative or positive. For example: If I had helped you in any way, I promise I would have. I salute you! Hello guys!!! Is there any difference between “somehow” and “somehow”? I mean, regardless of whether the sentence is negative or positive. For example: If I had helped you in any way, I promise I would have. I salute you! “somehow” seems more restrictive to me – offering an action to help. While, “in any way” seems broader – a less restricted offer of help. But I don’t see much difference in practice. Hello. As Dylons points out, some way is slightly more restrictive in nature, however in practice, and in most people’s speech, I would say there is no difference between the two versions. Just one thing, it should be “There’s some difference” and not “differences.” Hello. As Dylons points out, some way is slightly more restrictive in nature, however in practice, and in most people’s speech, I would say there is no difference between the two versions. Just one thing, it should be “There’s some difference” and not “differences.” Why “difference” without “s”? My teachers have always told me that by “any” (except the meaning of “any”) a noun count goes to the plural.... For example: I don’t have tomatoes There are no t-shirts I didn’t buy books and so on... I completely understand your teachers telling you to use the plural after any, but it seems that the difference can be some kind of exception. If you expected more than one difference, then it would not be wrong to use the plural, but as in this case it is likely that there would be only one difference, the most normal choice would be to use the singular. However, if you want to use the plural, you should make the verb plural as well. No. There are differences, but there are differences. I hope I was able to help you a bit with your question! I completely understand your teachers telling you to use the plural after any, but it seems that the difference can be some kind of exception. If you expected more than one difference, then it would not be wrong to use the plural, but as in this case it is likely that there would be only one difference, the most normal choice would be to use the singular. However, if you want to use the plural, you should make the plural verb No. Someone is there But there are differences. I hope I was able to help you lightly with your question! Oh! It is true, the verb ... ok, I'll take it as an exception. Thank you very much, you have already answered many of my questions in this forum. It counts with me if you need something from a native Spanish speaker. Greetings while, "in any way" seems larger - a less limited offer of help. I think that what is discussed here is probably the one with in any way, if you verbally emphasizes any, in a current offer, then you are suggesting a very wide offer, while this option is not available in some way. Otherwise, the difference probably would not be fantastic. Inverse to tell "I will help you in any way," can I say "I'll help you anywhere"? Please, please allow me to do one or two suggestions to help with your excellent English. As for, "there is differences", the problem is with the number of verb and the subject. You can say "there is some difference", or you can say "there are differences", depending on whether you are asking if there may be a difference or if there may be more than a difference. However, as Twist-Fud said, the singular would be more common. And yes, although there are shades of meaning in the use of "some" and "any" in many cases, in the example that you give, it would be a bit excessive to say that there is a true amount of difference. However, in your last post, there is a tiny difficulty on the use of the verb "to tell" and preposition "from". There is a useful explanation of "Tell" vs. "DÃ¬" at . Here, you need the verb "say" and preposition "in". (Prepositions are strange in all languages I know, and usually do not follow strict rules. You simply have to memorize them). Please try these little changes: instead of saying: "I will help you in any way", I can say, "Will you help you anywhere"? It would be even more polite to say: "I will help you as possible." I hope my little comments may have been some help. Oh! It is true, the verb ... ok, I'll take it as an exception. Thank you very much, you have already answered many of my questions in this forum.
