Niccolo Machiavelli, in dedicating his book to Lorenzo de 'Medici, urges the young prince of Florence to read the work of him and follow him's advice. He also asks the prince to consider his ugly ride of luck (the exile of him from Florentine politics). Having made the case of him, Machiavelli goes straight to the main fire of his work, as the principals, governed and preserved can be acquired. Machiavelli identifies three main types of principalities: hereditary, new or mixed. The hereditary principality passes power through the dominant family. It is not difficult to maintain the hereditary prince continues to govern as before. New principalities are created through military or civil acquisition. Mixed principalities (new territories added to an existing one) are of two types. If the new territory shares the same language and customs as the old one, the prince must extinguish the former government line and the rule as before. If the new territory does not share language and customs, the prince should reside in it or establish colonies composed of its citizens or soldiers. Whether he chooses to reside in it or establishing colonies, he must protect the most weak neighbors, weakening powerful, and do not let the powerful forces enter him territories of him. There are four ways in which a new prince can acquire a principality: from his arms, from the arms of others, through evil, and with civil vehicles. A principality that won by a prince alone the arms of him is more safe. Machiavelli lists great principles that came to power through its capacity: MosÃ¨, Cyrus, Romulus and Teseo. They pronounced effectively because they were all armed, unlike Savaronala, a Dominican friar that lost power because he didn't take his arms. A principality acquired by the arms of others needs a prince with luck that with virtue. Cesare Borgia is an example of a prince who has come to power through luck, but has lost the power of him through an unfavorable change of fortune, even if he was a great leader and did almost everything well. The principles that come to power through evil means can obtain power but not glory due to their conduct. Those who come to power from civil vehicles (the elections of the nobles or the people) must remember to win the support of the people because they are fundamental in moments of adversely. Machiavelli also mentions the ecclesiastical principality with the Pope as the ecclesiastical prince. In describing how the Pope's position has arrived to help a lot of power, Machiavelli does not make a great distinction between a religious prince and a territorial prince. Machiavelli identifies three types of armies: mercenaries, auxiliary and native. Because the mercenary forces are hired the hands that fight for a salary are unreliable in front of the battle. The auxiliary forces, or forces borrowed from an ally, are dangerous if they are victorious because the prince who uses them is under their obligation. Machiavelli strongly encourages every prince to use native troops. History has shown that the principles that have reached great things always used their troops. In fact, the only activity of a prince is the art of war. He must always engage in the physical and mental exercises of the war, especially in moments of peace. As for how a prince should govern and act, Machiavelli states that in an ideal world, it is virtuous for a prince to be good. But in reality, the principles that are away from ethical concerns and Everything possible for the benefit of their rule of states. Therefore, it is better to be thrifty of generous, cruel that lover, Crafty that honest. The general rule of Machiavelli must be as good as the circumstances allow, but be willing to use any means necessary for the good well the state. A feudal prince must be wise to control nobles and maintaining people's content. Fortresses are also useless if the prince does not have the support of the people of him. A prince earnings esteem and glory through the courage of him. He has to commit large companies that allow him to view him's abilities. When two neighbors are at war, a prince must never be neutral; He must take a position. The prince must have wisdom to choose the less risky business and act on it with courage. The wisdom is also necessary in the collection and satisfying its closest advisers and avoiding adulators. Machiavelli laments the decline of the city - Italian merit and attributes to the use of mercenary and auxiliary armies instead of the native forces. In concluding that the virtue, or ability and fortune must come together for success, Machiavelli implores Lorenzo de 'Medici to be the leader in Italy was waiting for-a prince to unite Italians, driving barbarians outside D 'Italy, and restore his beloved nation to his ancient splendor. I admit Machiavelli that those who want to earn the favor of a prince usually offer gifts worthy of greatness, but he, having no these things, will give him the only thing of value he possesses, his knowledge of politics, both modern and ancient. Stating that he has thought for a long time and severely on these issues and giving the qualifications of him as one with a lot of experience in politics, Machiavelli invites the prince to consider him's gift, as it is both short and devoid of Literary ornaments. A book of practical political value, the intent of him is not advised or presumptuously, but to offer intuitions about the state of people as the one who is from their ranks. I still reiterate how little and short the work is, Machiavelli expresses its main purpose of writing the book: "If you diligently read and consider, it will be revered in one of my deeper desires, which is that you will come To which the greatness that luck and qualities that promise. And if from the great height your height sometimes throw a look below for these humble places, you will see how I independently bear the heavy and relentless malice of luck.
